Sharpshooter takes out Southside transformer

Sometime in the early evening on Thursday, June 25, 1981, a sharpshooter, armed with a high-powered rifle, shot a hole in one of the 833 KVA substation transformers in Lone Gum Substation located near Huddleston, Virginia.

Lone Gum Substation, one of 26 electric power substations owned by Southside Electric Cooperative, is used to provide electric power to more than 950 consumers in Bedford County.

The resulting bullet hole caused oil in the transformer to drain out, and by 11:45 p.m. on Thursday night, the transformer shorted out causing high voltage fuses to blow, interrupting electric service to the 950-plus consumers in Bedford County. Electric service was, eventually, restored to these consumers around 2:35 a.m. on Friday morning.

Because a spare transformer was already in place in the substation, SEC service personnel were able to respond quickly and to switch to the spare unit with a minimum of time loss and inconvenience to consumers.

On Friday, June 26, 1981, the damaged transformer was removed from the substation, and another spare unit was set in place. The Cooperative had experienced storm damage in Campbell, Appomattox and Pittsylvania counties, and most of its service personnel were away from the Lone Gum Substation area when the outage occurred. Much of the outage time, therefore, involved getting service crews in place to work and restore electric service.

Anyone having information relative to the person or persons responsible for firing the shot that damaged the transformer should contact the Cooperative's office in Altavista.

Any information or details that can be given will be appreciated and held in a confidential manner. The cost of the damaged transformer, its replacement value, as well as the labor costs involved in changing out the damaged unit and installing and connecting the new transformer, all, must be borne by the Cooperative's consumer-members.

This loss of revenue, and the inconveniences caused consumers, is, usually, not considered by persons who commit a vandal act such as this.

DMV has ID cards

If you don't have a driver's license, proving your identity and age might be easier if you apply for a non-driver identification card issued by the Divison of Motor Vehicles.

Although non-drivers of all ages request the ID cards, Donald E. Williams, DMV commissioner, said they are issued primarily as a service for elderly people to help them cash their checks and prove that they qualify for senior citizen discounts. Williams noted that some merchants and banks may require additional identification.

The cards, first issued in July 1973, are available only to Virginia residents who do not have a driver's license. They include the owner's name and address, date of birth, sex, signature and color photo. Enclosed in a plastic case, the cards cost $5 and are valid for five years.

Last year, DMV issued about 40,000 cards, bringing the total number issued in the past seven and a half years to 138,628.

Applications for the IDs are available at any DMV branch office or license examining station. Individuals seeking the IDs must furnish the same proof of identity and date of birth required of driver's license applicants. DMV will accept birth certificates, military and school records and other similar documents.

To assist [illegible] seekers, Williams said the cards are mailed rather than delivered immediately, and DMV retains a file photograph of each applicant.
